

Patricia Logue

Patricia Logue is a Senior Lecturer in Acting and an in-house Director for the Richard Burton Company. She trained in Acting at the City University of New York (MFA) and in Voice at Central School of Speech & Drama, London (MA).

Before joining the Acting faculty at Royal Welsh, Patricia was a professional actor and acting coach and as a text and accent specialist she worked extensively in theatres and television both in the UK and Ireland. She continues to work professionally both as a Director and as a Text Associate on productions outside of college, when scheduling permits. Recent projects include Dialect Coach on Derry Girls, Channel Four, Text Associate on The Importance of Being Earnest, Vaudeville Theatre, West End and Director of Lose Yourself at The Sherman Theatre, Cardiff - where she has been an Associate Artist since 2016.

Patricia is passionate about teaching the craft of acting, passionate about training young actors to an excellent standard and genuinely interested in the continued growth, development and strengthening of the college's Acting course. She is an advocate for diversity, inclusivity and widening access in both actor training and the wider professional industry.
